Title of the Course: IED 441 (01) Literary Criticism I

Instructor: Prof.Dr. Serpil OPPERMANN

Year and Term: 2016 FALL

Classroom and Hours: Thursday 13:00-15:50 B2/204

Office Hours:

Aim of the Course:

This course introduces the students to the rise and development of literary criticism from its beginnings in Antiquity to the Romantic Theories of literature in the 19th century. Starting with the origins of criticism in Antiquity, students will be acquainted with the Homeric rhapsodes and their interpretative methods, the moral criticism of the Ionian philosophers and the use of Allegory as a rhapsodic defense of Homer's works. This is necessary for understanding Plato and Aristotle and the mimetic theories of literature as well as the beginnings of literary criticism. The main aim of this course is to study the general outlines of Mimetic theories of literature by focusing on the primary texts of major philosophers and poets dealing with the critical properties of literary texts, and then how these theories have come to be challenged after almost 2000 years of their domination in the Western literary tradition.

Course Outline:

Week I: Introduction to the development of criticism in Antiquity: Homeric rhapsodes; the moral criticism of the Ionian philosophers; the use of Allegory as a rhapsodic defense of Homer's works.
